

Connection in a Time of Social Isolation: Here's What Synagogue Life Looks Like Right Now

There's no question that the coronavirus crisis has affected each and every one of us, regardless of health status. Every day for the past few weeks, each of us has weighed the relative value of in-person classes, meetings, and get-togethers versus the potential risk of exposure.

We've relearned the skill of correctly washing our hands and getting to "clean." We've embraced new and humorous alternatives to the traditional handshake, stories, information, and misinformation about increasing numbers of people infected, quarantines, and travel bans.
